

Pipeless Sprinkler System

It seems everything with computers is going wireless these days. Wireless keyboard, mouse, speakers. Heck, you can check your email from the middle of a corn field now if you want to. Well, one inventive individual seems to have taken that concept and run with it. Allow me to introduce the world's first pipeless fire sprinkler system. That's right, folks, no need to install clumsy pipes anymore. The water just appears out of nowhere. There are still a few bugs to be worked out before the application for a patent is sent in. The main one being that it doesn't actually work.

What you see here is a clever attempt to get one by a fire inspector. The person who did this self-help project just popped the pipeless sprinkler heads through the ceiling, shined 'em up nice and perty, then stood by whistling softly. But thank goodness for a sharp-eyed inspector, who noticed that the sprinkler head was not in the right place. I'll bet those sly safety scammers are whistling a different tune now.

Folks, how often do you "cheat" when it comes to safety? Do you wear your PPE just long enough for the "safety guy" to pass by before taking it off? Just remember this ... window dressing safety only looks good. When it comes time to save life and limb, it's as worthless as a pipeless sprinkler.

